ABSTRACT

Governance is an open platform for the people to participate and a chance to involve in decision-making processes. According to John Stuart Mill, there are two major factors for decentralized governance. Firstly, local political institutions make citizens capable of real and informed participation. Secondly, such institutions would be more efficient and effective if informed by local interests and local knowledge. Decentralized governance thus became a way of enabling both participation and deliberation for effecting a form of direct democracy. Governance tends strongly to enhance speed, quantity, and quality of responses from government institutions; local governments have both authority and resources to respond quickly to problems and pressures from bottom without waiting for approval from upper levels.
